Do you think it might be because the majority of judges and lawyers are men? There is something of a "good old boys" attitude, and they believe men more than women? The proponents of "parental alienation" and "fathers' rights" sound like abusers themselves from what I have seen.

That's very possible. A woman judge in CA ruled for an abusive dad to get access to the kids, and he ended up abusing them. She said it was her training that made her rule that way.

12:56:57 From Jessica Evans : Best interest factors as categories

12:59:28 From Becki Johnson : If a very dangerous incident happened in the distant past, the abuser may seem to be less violent and "improving" but in reality they don't need to repeat the severe behavior because the implicit threat is always there. He already showed her that he could kill her if he wanted to. So reporting incidents from several years ago is still relevant, if possible.

12:59:32 From Audrey Whitaker : QUESTION how does that work, that the judge can look at the parenting app?

12:59:39 From Jessica Evans : Replying to "Best interest factor..."

Someone asked me for more info on best interest factors...

Best interest factors do vary from State to State, some you will certain factors are commonly included:

12:59:47 From Jessica Evans : Replying to "Best interest factor..."

1. The wishes of the child (if old enough to capably express a reasonable preference);
2. The mental and physical needs of the child/mental and physical health of the parents;
3. Any special needs a child may have and how each parent takes care of those needs;
4. Religious and/or cultural considerations;
5. The need for continuation of stable home environment; provide a safe home and adequate food, clothing, and medical care

12:59:48 From Ladonna : Walk through some situations with the victim to help her think in terms of impacts. For example: child became silent and was unable to complete homework

12:59:51 From Joy Forrest : Replying to " QUESTION how does t..."

Yes

12:59:55 From Jessica Evans : Replying to "Best interest factor..."

6. Other children whose custody is relevant to this child's custody arrangement;
7. Support and opportunity for interaction with members of the extended family of either parent (such as grandparents);
8. Interactions and interrelationships with other members of household;
9. Adjustments to school and community;
10. The age and sex of the child;
11. And The presence of domestic violence in the home
12. Parental use of excessive discipline or emotional abuse; and
13. Evidence of parental drug, alcohol or child/sex abuse.

13:02:18 From Amanda Story : But attorneys do use the OFW against a victim too by taking incidents and pretending they happened to her client so I'd see my words and situations written in motions as if I'm the abuser - if someone would actually check these they would see but they only see the motions in my case

13:02:59 From Julie : Love the encouragement to not lose it over every incident....it is SOOOO hard.

yes, it helps to bounce things off of others, so you can weed through the most important. cause the abuser just wants to have us constantly up in arms and the more someone talks the less things seem important and overshadow the things you are trying to focus on.

13:06:28 From amanda : What was the name of the judge that stepped down?
