Replying to "QUESTION - At what point do they transition from these controlling tactics to full-blown psychopathy and 'attempted murder' other extreme acts of control / physical violence?"

@Brandon Eberl An abuser who attempts murder or abuses in an extreme physical way - may or may not have a mental illness like psychopathy. As far as the progression from emotional to physical abuse - it's very dependent on the situation. Usually abuse increases in severity over time. There are certain events that increase the likelihood of more extreme behaviors like the woman sanding up to abuse, separating from the abuser in any way. The abuser increases the abuse to maintain power and control.

QUESTION - She and I have been told we did not follow Matthew 18 BECAUSE we are related (i.e., you don't count in the Matthew 18 model because he's your dad are just parroting what she says). How do you combat this spiritual abuse?

From Brooke: Brandon, I'm sorry for what you and your mom have experienced. There is no where in scripture that says Mt 18 does not apply to or between family. So that's an extra biblical interpretation. I would also say, if they are arguing this you are probably not going to win them with any arguments. For your own mind, believe yourself. Search your heart. Ask the Lord to reveal any wrong ways in you and then trust that if something needs to be revealed now or later the Lord will reveal but you are the Lord's and let him judge.

I have a woman who attends the Bible study I teach, who has been diagnosed variously with schizophrenia, paranoia, paranoid schizophrenia, and bipolar disorder. She hates the way she feels on meds, so she doesn't take them. She is homeless by choice, because she is convinced that if "they" put her in assisted housing, "they" will force her to take meds. Her connection with reality is tenuous at best, but she is very intelligent. She can control herself in order to attend the Bible study, but she apparently has limited capacity to exercise that much self control so she gets herself in trouble during other church activities.

It's so complicated and challenging to deal with.
